(Background on Kayo Uchida Sato follows.)

KAYO UCHIDA SATO

1896 – 1984

Kayo Uchida Sato was born on September 23, 1896, in Okayamaken, Tsukubogun, Yamaji, Japan. She was the eldest of five children.

Kayo arrived in Seattle, Washington in 1915 as the pre-arranged picture bride of her first cousin, Benzo Sato. They were married in Seattle. Because of the language barrier they worked as seasonal laborers in Washington and Oregon, and later as a husband and wife team in the kitchen and dining hall of the Standard Box and Lumber Company's mill and logging camp in Scofield, Oregon. Kayo's two eldest daughters, Aiko and Masako, were born at this camp.

Around 1920, the Satos settled on a small farm in Hillsdale, Oregon to provide permanency for their children. In 1924, with two more daughters and expecting her fifth child, Kayo made a trip to Japan to be at the bedside of her dying father. It was a sad trip for Kayo, as both her father and two eldest daughters passed away. She returned to Portland after her first son was born. As the years passed, she was blessed with three more daughters and five sons.

In 1935, she and her family moved to another small farm near the Raleigh community. Because of the Asian background of the family, they were not permitted to become American citizens and were prohibited from purchasing property. After one more move to another small farm near Beaverton, the family was uprooted in May 1942, at which time they were transported to the Minidoka Relocation Center. Kayo and her family were to be interned in this camp until October 1945, after which they returned to Portland. The family moved into a war time public housing complex for shipyard workers constructed below a canal. On Memorial Day of 1948, the earthen dike of the canal gave way, flooding the city of Vanport. They managed to escape, but lost all their possessions except for a few clothes. After living in another public housing project for two years, they moved in 1950 to a house purchased by one of Kayo's sons. During this period, five of her sons entered the United States military service.

In May 1953, Kayo, her husband Benzo and their two youngest sons traveled to Japan for a reunion with relatives. While in Japan, Kayo realized that her thinking and attitudes had changed and she could no longer fit into Japanese culture. Her eleven surviving children living in the United States cemented her decision to return to America.

With the passing of her husband in March 1954, and the dispersal of her grown children, Kayo moved to the Senior Citizens International Terrace Apartments in Seattle to be near her youngest son. She lived there happily and independently until the age of 87, at which time she moved to Ann Arbor, Michigan to live with one of her daughters. There, at the age of 88 years and 2 months, she quietly passed away.

As public schools were not available during her childhood, Kayo received her formal education from her village temple priest. The priest provided an intensive and extensive education for Kayo, and Kayo, in return, became an excellent student. She regretted leaving her schooling for she realized the future belonged to the educated. In her spare time, she read stories to her children by a kerosene lamp. She also taught them reading, writing and arithmetic before they entered school. Kayo also encouraged higher education for her children, but emphasized that each child would have to finance his or her own way. When Kayo's grandchildren visited her, she would lecture them on the importance of education, stressing the need for graduate studies as she felt, in these changing times, advanced degrees were necessary.

Kayo Sato never forgot her humble upbringing. She had sympathy and tolerance for the poor of all nations, especially minorities and Asian peoples. As she used to say, "The poor have only one way to go and that is up...given the opportunity."
